Orioles have eyes on Yanks

Associated Press

Oakland, Calif.
The Baltimore Orioles are playing so well now that they're not worrying about their own games. They've taken to worrying about the Yankees' games.

After the Orioles won their eighth straight Sunday, a 3-0 victory over Oakland, Manager Earl Weaver said to his office, where the New York-California game was being received via a phone line to Anaheim.

The last score before Weaver and his coaches headed for the team bus outside the Oakland Coliseum was Yankees 3, California 2. But Weaver was smiling. (The Yankees eventually won 4-2.)

"But there will be a lot of ups and downs between now and the end of the season," Weaver said. "This is the kind of baseball we're playing every day now — good pitching, and we win with one swing of the bat," he said.

One swing was all Baltimore needed yesterday because Mike Flanagan, aided by double plays in three straight innings, shut out the A's on seven hits. It was his ninth straight victory over Oakland.

The Orioles, a half-game behind the first-place Yankees in the American League East, lifted their record for August to 18-4.

The A's lost their fourth straight game, marring Billy Martin Appreciation Day festivities. The A's manager was honored and presented with about $30,000 worth of gifts in pregame ceremonies attended by some longtime friends from Martin's days with the New York Yankees, including Joe DiMaggio, Mickey Mantle and Whitey Ford.

New York 4, California 2 — Bobby Murcer delivered a tie-breaking sacrifice fly in the seventh inning and Ron Guidry pitched two shutout innings in relief for the visiting Yankees.

Guidry, who was relegated to the bull pen earlier this week in favor of Rudy May, was making only his second relief appearance of the year.

Kansas City 7, Cleveland 5 — Frank White tripled to key a six-run third inning and also doubled, drove in two runs and scored once for the host Royals. Winner Dennis Leonard (15-6) struck out four and walked one before needing relief help in the ninth from Dan Quisenberry, who posted his 28th save.

Kansas City's George Brett, the major league's leading hitter, went 1-for-4, dropping his average to .397.

Mattke wins finals in Northwest tennis

John Mattke defeated Andy Rice 7-6, 6-4 Sunday to win the Northwest Grand Prix tennis finals at the 94th St. Racquet Club.

Another former college player, Marnie Wheaton of Minnesota, won the women's finals with a 3-6, 6-1, 6-1 victory over Jill Schlinder of Edina.

Mauch

He threw whiskey bottles against the clubhouse wall; he unloaded dugout bats onto the field; he dumped the post-game cold cuts onto the locker room floor. Years ago, when an opposing catcher made a diving catch and tumbled into Mauch's dugout, he knocked the ball from the catcher's mitt. Mauch hated to lose.

But he was a loser, at least according to the narrow and unforgiving statistics that rule the game he loves. As he packed his bags yesterday, his team stood at 54-71 — only slightly below his composite won-loss percentage. His teams are 1,524-1,506. According to the numbers, his greatest achievement is longevity. After nine years in Philadelphia, seven in Montreal and nearly five in Minnesota, he had managed longer than anyone else still active.

But he was praised for far more than simple endurance. Detroit Manager Sparky Anderson said yesterday that Mauch "might be the best manager who ever lived," and that sort of praise has echoed throughout Mauch's career — a career that not only has never included a pennant but has included a second- place finish just once.

And, typical of the bittersweetness of Mauch's career, that second- place finish was the most disappointing end to any of his seasons in the sun. That came in 1964, when his Philadelphia team blew a 6½-game lead with 12 games remaining. The Phillies had to lose 10 of their last 12 games to avoid the pennant, and Mauch never denied that the memory of that swoon — "our little slump," he would call it — always haunted him.

Failure and disappointment had always dogged Mauch, and it always would. He had not been a star as a player. Rather, he was cut from the classic managerial mold — the utility infielder who studied the game from the bench, eventually managing to scratch out 737 big league at-bats as much because of guile and courage as because of ability.

But he always knew what his future held. He was 24 years old when Billy Southworth, his manager at Rustic, called him over and placed a weathered hand on his shoulder. "You're going to manage in the majors some day," Southworth told him. "One piece of advice: Don't fall in love with your players."

Mauch did a pretty good job of remembering the advice. Over the years he was able to keep some distance between himself and his employees, earning their respect without encouraging their friendship. But there was an exception: Mike Marshall.

Detroit's Al Cowens scored in the fourth inning at the Met Sunday after knocking the ball out of catcher Sal Butera's glove.

Mauch had nurtured Marshall at Montreal in 1971. Others had written off the chunky reliever, but not Mauch. Mauch encouraged the screwball that others regarded as a gimmick, and it wasn't long before Marshall paid dividends. Their friendship grew, and it continued when Marshall came to the Twins in 1978 as their first free agent, saying he would play only for Mauch.

But then something happened. The players struck before the 1980 season started, and Marshall was a leader of the union. Mauch, steeped in the traditions of the game that had taken him from his Depression poverty in Kansas to the affluent condo set of Palm Springs, Calif., could not accept what was happening. He called the strike "the most distasteful thing to happen to me in all the years I've been in baseball."

Nor could Mauch accept Marshall's presence at the head of the picket line. One day, as Marshall tells it, Mauch called his players together in spring training and asked them to tell him, without speaking to each other, whether they would leave camp. Marshall says he intervened, that he told Mauch that he was engaging in an unfair labor practice. Mauch's response, says Marshall, was a two-word retort as old as the national pastime.

"He had lost at the moment all the respect of all the players," Marshall said yesterday. "When I first met, Gene he was very dictatorial. But it seemed to me that he mellowed. The little things like the height of the socks were a big issue in Montreal; well, they became a big issue again this year. Calvin Griffith just beat him and wore him down. But I think Gene Mauch is capable of looking in the mirror and saying, 'What have I become?' Maybe that's what he has done now."

Marshall's interpretation leaves plenty of room for argument, but there is no doubt that the labor hassle and the eventual release of Marshall angered the sourness that would lead to Mauch's exit.

The sourness was most evident on the field, where players often seemed unaware of even The Pundemonials. At one point, two men slid into the same base at the same time. There was bickering in the locker room. There were factions, there were angry mutterings from those who weren't playing. These things happened in other locker rooms, but they were unusual at Metropolitan Stadium.

In the past, these things had not been tolerated. When Danny Ford backpedaled toward home plate in the final days of the 1978 season — only to miss the target altogether — it was immediately understood that Ford had played his last season in Minnesota.

In the past, the locker room had been filled with the silence of death after a defeat. This was not so much a tribute to the players' anguish as it was to their fear of Mauch's reproach. (When the Twins flew to Boston in 1977 after a disastrous trip in New York, Mauch was outraged to hear many of the players joking. He avoided the team bus to the hotel, opting instead for the dark silence of a taxicab. "I don't want to hear the sounds of joy," he explained with the sort of spontaneous eloquence that often burst from his gruffness. He didn't hear those sounds much after that.)

But things were not so silent this year, and the bickering continued. Mauch was no longer immune from criticism. Mauch platooned too much, the critics said. Mauch busted too much. Mauch overmanaged.

One thing was sure: he loved to manage. Gene Mauch's world may not be a broad one, but if he is a stranger to the global village, it is not because of any lack of intelligence. Rather, it is because he has channeled so much of his passion toward baseball. Those who peeked into his office — whether at home or on the road — would find him staring at line-up cards and old data as many as seven or eight hours before the game. Gene Mauch the manager had not been blessed with much more talent than Gene Mauch the player, and so he searched for loopholes. He brought in an outfielder to play the infield in do-or-die ninth or extra-inning situations. He had his slowest man stealing off if his charts revealed that man to be the most likely to get on base against that particular pitcher on that particular field. He juggled the line-up every day. Not for him the superstitions of other managers.

His approach may have been scientific, but it didn't put the ball out of the park or hit cutoff men or go from first to third on singles. It only earned him more frustration, more bittersweet milestones. When he won his 1,500th game this year — a feat matched by only nine other managers — he asked: "Is that what it was?" And then he added: "It shouldn't have taken that long. Fifteen hundred games in 15 years — that would be a hell of a lot of fun, because it would have meant you were winning a lot of pennants."

There may yet be a pennant in Gene Mauch's future, but for now, his career would carry the same epitaph that cursed his days in Philadelphia and Montreal: "Gene Mauch: the best manager who never won a pennant."

Mandlikova overpowers Jaeger in title match

Associated Press

Mahwah, N.Y.
Hana Mandlikova of Czechoslovakia completed her finest week'sa ten-ais pro Sunday by scoring a comeback victory over rookie Andrea Jaeger in the singles final of the Women's Cup championship.

Goryl

Goryl probably will get a $30,000 raise to $60,000 from coach to manager, hardly comparable with Mauch's $190,000 contract and virtually all expenses — car, apartment, clubhouse dues, et al.

The new manager promised no extreme shakeup in personnel or whether he'd continue Mauch's early-inning batting game.

"No promises," said Goryl. "Let me think about it a while. One thing I intend to do is take greater advantage of John Castino's hitting and speed and move him closer to the top of the batting order. Another thing, we hope to get outfielder Ken Landreaux healthy this week, because we can use him."

About continuing Mauch's platooning, Goryl said, "I'm not an advocate of it, maybe certain positions. I prefer to play the best."

Goryl started in baseball in 1951 at Bluefield in the Chicago Cubs' organization. He first played in the National League with the Cubs in 1957, played with Minneapolis in 1959 under Mauch and at St. Paul in 1960 in the Americas Association days. He joined the Twins as an extra infielder in 1961 and stayed through 1964. His lifetime major league batting average was .225, .230 in the National League and .221 in the American League.

As a minor league manager, Goryl won pennants at Wisconsin Rapids of the Midwest League in 1973 and 1974, at Reno of the California League in 1976 and at Orlando of the Southern League in 1978.

As third-base coach under Mauch, Goryl has shown good judgment as a traffic cop on the runners' crucial last turn on the way home. He would like to see even greater run production as manager, something Mauch lamented in leaving.

some things up here, too. I'll play as hard for John as I did for Mauch."

Twins' third baseman John Castino said, "Mauch is an intelligent man. I'm sure he made the right decision."

Ron Jackson, Twins' first baseman, said, "I thought Mauch did a good job. We have no superstar players and we have some who don't yet know how to play the game."

Infielder Pete Mackanin said, "Gene Mauch is the reason I'm in the major leagues. If he manages again, I'd like to play for him if I'm not with the Twins."

"It was a double loss today," said Geoff Zahn, the Twins' losing pitcher yesterday, "but losing the manager was the most important loss."

Outfielders Dave Edwards and Danny Goodwin, who might have some complaints about not being used enough by Mauch, were kind in their comments. Goodwin said, "It was his decision whom to play. I don't know whether I'll get a greater opportunity now. Anyway, I'm not thinking in those terms now." Edwards added, "Sure, I'd like to play more, but Mauch did what he thought was best for the ball club."

Glenn Adams, the Twins' left-handed designated hitter, denied the suggestion that he already has asked the new manager to drop Mauch's platoon system and play him every day.

Veteran pitcher Jerry Koosman said, "I pitch the best I know how, no matter the manager. I was John Goryl luck. Our club played better last year and I think the club is better this year than it has been playing."

Twins' shortstop Roy Smalley, Mauch's nephew, said, "I've got nothing to say now. What I would have to say would be more than your editors could handle."

There is some speculation already that the 27-year-old Smalley might be considered for Twins' player-manager next season. Along with Goryl, former Twins slugger Harmon Killebrew is another name mentioned as a possible manager next year.

But Twins President Calvin Griffith quickly scotched those rumors. "I don't believe in player-managers in the major leagues and I told Killebrew when he left us in 1974 that he should manage Denver for some minor league experience before coming up here to manage, but his wife didn't want him to do that. I prefer a manager with minor league experience."

In Mauch's last day as manager of the Twins, they hewed to the seven-hit pitching of Detroit left-hander Dan Schatzeder (7-9). The Tigers built a 3-0 lead over the first seven innings against Zahn (10-17), who went all the way and also gave up seven hits.

The Twins rune came in the ninth inning on a one-out double by Jackson and a two-out homer by Bombo Rivera into the left-field stands.

Perhaps Detroit Manager Sparky Anderson paid the highest compliment to Mauch when he said, "I say this not out of friendship, but out of respect. His record won't show it, but Mauch may be the best manager who ever managed. He would never lose with the best players. They say he blew a pennant down the stretch in Philadelphia in 1964, but, in truth, he had about the third best club that year and had been playing above themselves for most of the year."
